Marshallese-English Dictionary

The Sounds of Marshallese and Rules for Spelling the Language

The basic rule for spelling Marshallese is to spell words according to their sounds. Such a spelling is said to be phonetic. Some languages have phonetic spelling, and some do not. Those that do are easier for students to learn to read and write. The information below is taken for the Marshallese-English Dictionary published by the University of Hawai'i Press in 1976, and continues to apply to the revised version out in line in 2009. (www.trussel2.com/MOD/). It lists each sound and shows how it is spelled in several words.

The letters used to show the sounds of the language and spell the words in this dictionary are listed here in the alphabetical order used in the dictionary. It is the same order used in English dictionaries, except that a letter with a mark follows the same letter without a mark. A brief phonetic description and a phonetic symbol are given for the sound of each letter, followed by several example words. (The term LIGHT is used to describe consonants that are pronounced with the body of the tongue in an "at rest" position for such consonants; the term HEAVY is used for consonants that have the back of the tongue raised (velarized) and the root of the tongue retracted (pharyngealized) so as to elongate the oral cavity, thereby giving the consonant a "heavier" or "darker" sound. The rounding referred to is that of the lips. This and the other phonetic terminology are explained in greater detail in MRG 2.)
